CYPRUS- VENICE HISTORIC RELATIONSHIP

The special relationships that Cyprus maintained with Venice and Italian cities have been marked by contrasting phases that show a consolidation of reports throughout the Middle Ages to the Renaissance.

The first known links go back to the Byzantine period, when the Emperor Manuel Comnenus gives to the Venetians the right to trade and settle on the Island since 1147. A community soon settled in Lemesos (Limassol) and the surrounding region and also in Pafos and Lefkosia (Nicosia). In the 1180s, the Venetians are already a powerful community; no monument of this period remains and the information comes from a manuscript, deposited in a Venetian private collection.

The conquest of the island by Richard the Lionheart and its transformation into a state ruled by the Frankish dynasty of Lusignan, does not strengthen the Venetian settlement on the Island; indeed, for unknown reasons, the properties of the Venetians are confiscated by the Crown in the years 1191-1192. Throughout the thirteenth century, Venice is trying to obtain compensation for this confiscation, but the tensions between the Commune of Venice and the Kingdom of Cyprus lasted until 1302, without impeding on the activities of merchants in key ports of the Island (Famagusta, Lemesos and Pafos).

With the restoration of diplomatic relations in 1302, starts a period of progressive diffusion of the Italian influence in the Frankish kingdom. This influence is expressed first through the financial and commercial activities, in spite of the climate of rivalry between Genoa and Venice. In this context, the Cornaro family became one of the main supporters of the Lusignan dynasty, and in the 1360s, King Peter I concedes to Marco Cornaro the fief of Episkopi which will become an important centre for sugar production and a source of enrichment for the Venetian family. The support of “Cornaro della Piscopia” becomes essential when the Kingdom of Cyprus enters into a long financial crisis after its defeat by Genoa, which rules Famagusta directly from 1374 until 1464.

The financial dependence of the Lusignans on Venice follows a significant turn in the cultural world when a foundation was established in 1393 to enable young people of Cypriot families (Frankish, Greek and Syrian) to study at the University of Padua, the great intellectual centre of the Venetian Terra Ferma conquered by Venice in 1405. Throughout the fifteenth century, a large part of the elite of the kingdom is educated by Italian teachers; the movement that links the Cypriot elite with the Paduan and Venetian intellectual circles has two fundamental consequences: on the one hand, it feeds permanent exchanges on both sides of the Mediterranean, which causes the progressive settlement of Cypriots in Italy; on the other hand, it strengthens the influence of Venice in the court of the last Lusignan, which precipitated the marriage of James II de Lusignan with Catherine Cornaro.

The sudden death of James II opens the way to the accession to the throne by Catherine Cornaro in 1474 and the beginning of the direct domination of Venice: Cyprus becomes a province of the Venetian maritime empire, administered directly from the mainland. Accordingly, the island becomes part of a colonial system where officers sent by the Senate of Venice introduce their own political and cultural environment; therefore, the defensive system of the island is reorganised according to the principles of military architecture of the Italian Renaissance, both in the interior and the cities on the coast, while Lefkosia and Famagusta are experiencing changes in their public space, according to classic designs of Venetian cities. The period between 1474-1570 is undoubtedly the period where the links between Venice and Cyprus are the most dense. The formal integration of Cyprus into the Dominio da Mar in 1489 enhances the penetration of Italian culture in the island, so that the taste for Renaissance develops within the Cypriot elite, increasingly living half way between Venice, or the mainland, and the island. This elite borrows the literary, philosophical and aesthetic values that animate the circles of scholars, it follows the fashion of the metropolis and adopts its social behaviours. The civilisation of the Italian Renaissance penetrates deeply the Cypriot nobility and the wealthy do not hesitate to decorate churches on their domains by painters drawing their inspiration from Italy.

The Ottoman conquest of the summer of 1570 puts an end to the Venetian domination of Cyprus and detaches the island from the Italian environment. Relations with Venice were not totally broken but incorporation into the Empire of the Sultan reinserts the island into the Orthodox world, now becoming accustomed for a long while to live under the government of a Muslim state. The disappearance of the old aristocracy opens the way for the emergence of new elites linked to the Patriarchate of Constantinople and dealing with the Ottomans; gradually aesthetic models inspired by Italian art are no longer renewed and new cultural references are required.

Only a few expatriate noble families in Venice and Italy after 1570 keep the memory of a Greek culture nourished by the principles of the Renaissance but after two or three generations, these families are completely assimilated into Italian society and lose their connection with the island. While the trade relations between Cyprus and Venice continue until the eighteenth century, Venice still attracts Cypriot scholars, who may acquire books printed in Greek or publish books, as does the Archimandrite Kyprianos in 1777. In this presentation of the historical frame between Cyprus and Italy, it is clear that the monuments showing the close relationship between the two countries are built in Cyprus between 1474 and 1570; before the Venetian domination, it is difficult to distinguish exclusive influence of Italian culture on the island whether in architecture or painting, because during the reign of the Lusignans, the Cypriot civilisation is marked by the Frankish influence until the fourteenth century, before becoming a hybrid culture (Franco-Byzantine) in the fifteenth century. Only the period of the Venetian domination opens the way for the systematic features of Italian civilisation.

In Venice, however, there is scattered evidence of links between Cyprus and Venice in a few monuments that relate to a broader period, from the mid-fourteenth century to the beginning of the seventeenth. It is important to emphasise that many testimonials attesting to the density of relations between Cyprus and Venice are not accessible to a wide audience because these are in manuscripts or documents stored in places with limited accessibility.

CATERINA CORNARO

Born on 30th of April 1454, Caterina Cornaro was the daughter of Marco Cornaro della Ca' Grande, of a wealthy Venetian family which had close ties with the Lusignan Kingdom during the fifteenth century. By her grandmother, she was related to the Greek family of the Comnenus of Trebizond, and her grandfather was Duke of Naxos; in other words, Caterina had Greek blood in her veins, could speak Greek and therefore was to be very popular among Greek people.

She was married at the age of fourteen, in July 1468, under pressure from the Venetian government which wanted to extend its influence over the Kingdom of Cyprus and obtained from James II, the last Lusignan King, the promise that Caterina would inherit the Kingdom in case James would die first. Caterina received an extraordinary dowry, about 100.000 ducats. The formal wedding ceremony took place in Famagusta in December 1472. Seven months later, in August 1473, she was widowed but being pregnant at the time, gave birth to a son, James III, 50 days later. She acted then as regent of the Kingdom but when her one-year-old child died, in August 1474, she became the heiress of the Kingdom. Immediately, the Venetian government sent Caterina's brother and uncle, together with a fleet and an army in order to secure Venetian power over the island. Living first in Famagusta then in Lefkosia, Caterina could not reign as an independent queen and, despite her popularity, she was forced to resign and to put the Kingdom in the hands of Venice in 1489 (as one can see in the monument of Doge Pietro Mocenigo in the Saints John and Paul church in Venice).

Caterina arrived in Venice at the beginning of June 1489 and a great company of nobles and ladies accompanying the Doge welcomed the Queen of Cyprus. In order to express gratitude, Venice granted Caterina the territory and castle of Asolo, in the Terra Ferma, in the hilly area of Treviso. In fact, Venice provided a golden exile to Caterina, watching her travels, fearing intrigues and prohibiting too close links with Cyprus. Until the end of her life, Caterina maintained a brilliant court at Asolo, where poets, humanists, musicians and artists could gather. She died on the 10th of July 1510 and was buried in the family chapel inside the church of Santi Apostoli, in Venice. Her remains were later removed to the church of San Salvatore where a slab commemorates her memory.

LEFKOSIA

Fig.7 Aerial photograph of Lefkosia

After the departure of Caterina Cornaro to Venice in 1489, Lefkosia became the capital city of the Regno di Cipro where three officers heading the colonial government were installed. The city was also the main place of residence of the aristocracy and where many religious institutions, latin or orthodox, were established since the thirteenth century. In spite of the wealth accumulated by the nobility, the city did not have major monumental construction, except for the WALLS OF THE CITY. This was one of the most innovative enterprises of military Renaissance architecture. Its instigator was the engineer Giulio Savorgnano who transformed completely, in six months only (starting on the 1st of June 1567), the defensive system left by the Lusignan which was considered obsolete and unsuited to modern warfare. To complete the project, over 1,800 houses, 4 beautiful palazzi, 80 churches and three monasteries were razed to allow construction of the new walls. It was designed on a radial plan, in a star form with eleven bastions and only 3 gates. The bastions bore either the names of some leading Venetian officers (Mula, Querini, Barbaro, Loredano), or those of nobles who agreed to finance and organise the works (Flatro, Carafa, Podocataro, Costanzo, Davila, Tripoli, Rocas). The perimeter of the enclosure is 4.8 km. The exceptional quality of this enclosure is recognized by the apparatus of walls, built with a facing of beautiful stonework placed on thick mud walls. They are protected by a large moat that is today partially filled, changing its original appearance. There are three gates. To the east, FAMAGUSTA GATE is particularly impressive with the breadth of its internal layout which includes an archway, a high dome and several rooms used for the guard house; the front door of Famagusta Gate is derived from the Lazaretto Gate in Candia (Heraklion), Crete, which was built by Michele Sanmicheli, another major architect of Venice. Its device is simple, combining a triangular facade with the rounded lines of the pediment, the door and the windows, four coats-of-arms of Venetian officers, carved on the pillars. The second gate, to the west, is Pafos Gate. The third to the north, Kyrenia Gate, has undergone considerable changes in the 1930s, so that it has lost its function. An incomplete inscription, related to a Venetian officer stationed in 1562, was inserted there. Despite openings made in modern times to facilitate car access, the Venetian walls of 1567 still impress with their volume and the regularity of their layout. The military qualities of this work did not prevent the capture of the city by the Ottoman troops three years later, on the 9th of September, 1570; however, Lefkosia was a prototype of military Renaissance architecture, and Giulio Savorgnano reproduced this model when Venice charged him, twenty-five years later, to build the fortress of Palmanova, in Friuli, to block the Ottoman threat. Lefkosia has retained little evidence of civil Renaissance architecture.

Fig.9 Carved marble lintel bearing the Coat of arms of Podocataro family, entrance of Chatzigeorgakis Kornesios House

The main such evidence is associated with CHATZIGEORGAKIS KORNESIOS' HOUSE, the grand dragoman of the island between 1779 and 1809. The house is located near the archbishop's palace. This house, which has undergone many alterations over the centuries, is the major example of aristocratic residence of Lefkosia on a plan dating back to the Frankish period. It is highly probable that this house was the Podocataro family's palazzo, because at the entrance of the house there is a carved marble tablet bearing the Coat of arms of the family, as that which can be seen in Venice on the funeral monument of Livio Podocataro in the church of San Sebastiano. The marble plaque combines several symbols, because one recognises the emblem of Venice with the lion of St. Mark above the Byzantine two-headed eagle and foliage carrying pomegranates. The style of this high-relief reveals artists who were rather clumsy in the execution of the original composite motifs. Without any doubt, it is a local production that gives the interesting image of a mixed aesthetic, between the Renaissance model and traditions inherited from the Byzantine civilisation.

The religious architecture, that was so flourishing during the Lusignan time, is not well documented for the period of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, probably because the maintenance of many institutions in the Frankish period restricted the capacity of noble families to make new investments.

One of the few foundations was that of the hospital of the Augustinians, at the initiative of Archbishop Guglielmo Goneme, who came to retire in St. Mary's Church, now OMERIYE MOSQUE, in 1469. From this hospital, only a wall remains, behind the church, pierced by two windows the decorations of which reveal a direct and early import of Italian models, with a delicate sculpted pediment and jambs.

Apart from the hospital of the Augustinians, traces of the penetration of Renaissance aesthetic in the churches are difficult to identify, because they are in most cases adapted to the Franco-Byzantine style. Thus, the Church of the PANAGIA CHRYSALINIOTISSA, the foundation of which dates from the Byzantine period, combines several architectural elements of Franco-Byzantine style, but as they were made at different times, it is difficult to attribute only to the sixteenth century the renovation or construction of the building. The insertion of an Italian styled coat-of-arms in the northern wall of the church indicates the possibility of renovation at the time of the Venetian rule and one can probably attribute to this period the arcades of what could have been the courtyard of the monastery, but their style does not show any assimilation of Renaissance patterns. The door, windows and tops of the capitals are in fact imitations of the Franco-Byzantine local style that follow similar principles to those of Bedestan's great portal.

The church STAVROS TOU MISSIRIKOU belongs to this class of monuments where different styles are associated. Located in the city centre behind the church of Panagia Faneromeni, this church is very small and is built according to an unusual plan for Greek churches, with a unique nave topped by a dome. Its exterior decoration is characterised by a cornice composed of corbels and foliage, referring to the Franco-Byzantine motifs, but they are associated with volutes, which are borrowed from the decorative repertoire of Renaissance art. This detail shows in fact a limited influence of Italian aesthetic of the Cypriot architects and master masons of the sixteenth century.

The clearest evidence of the Venetian presence is in Lefkosia's museums. Among the many interesting icons of the BYZANTINE MUSEUM OF THE ARCHBISHOP MAKARIOS III FOUNDATION collections, several exhibit the taste for Italian culture of the Cypriot elite of Lefkosia during the late fifteenth and the sixteenth centuries. In twelve icons, the donors are depicted in their Italian dress, both men and women, indicating the importance given to following the standards of the Venetian fashion as the clothes style changes very often from one portrait to another. More than anywhere else in Cyprus, the icons of the Byzantine Museum demonstrate the different ways by which Italian pictorial culture was received on the island. Some icons present traditional Byzantine composition executed with some Italian architectural display (Communion of the Apostles from the Panagia Chrysaliniotissa church) or with attention to the expression of human feelings (The Virgin in the style of Madre della Consolazione, from the Panagia Chrysaliniotissa church). Other icons demonstrate that pure Italian composition was adopted by Cypriot artist as the icon of the Pietà (from Agia Marina church at Pera Chorio Nisou). In some cases, Byzantine and Italian aesthetics and techniques are so mixed that the icons could have been produced in any country where Greeks and Venetians lived together (The Virgin between St. Nicholas and St. George, from Agios Georgios church at Vatili). One can also admire the complete assimilation of Renaissance culture in a picture which could have been painted in an Italian province (Adoration of the Magi, from the Panagia Faneromeni church). Apart from the icons, one notes the unique gilded silver chalice made for Agios Mamas monastery in 1501, which reveals the high quality of the liturgical vessels used in the churches of Lefkosia and revealing the art of the silversmiths and goldsmiths working in Cyprus. The collections of the Byzantine Museum can be considered as the best guide to understand how Greek and Italian cultures intermixed.

Two other museums have collections of artefacts connected with the long history of Italo-Cypriot relationships. The MUSEUM OF THE HISTORY OF CYPRIOT COINAGE belongs to the BANK OF CYPRUS CULTURAL FOUNDATION and has a permanent exhibition which traces the development of Cypriot coinage from the first coins issued during the sixth century B.C. to modern times. Two thousand and six hundred years of turbulent Cypriot history come alive through more than 500 coins, divided into nine chronological sections and exhibited in twenty three showcases. A chronological section is dedicated to the Venetian period. The Foundation's Rare Historical Documents Collection, focusing on the history of Cyprus, includes manuscripts and printed books, dated from the sixteenth to the twentieth century. The earliest material found in the Collection are letters exchanged between Venetian merchants regarding goods transported through Famagusta harbour between 1407 and 1493. The printed editions include travel books by Europeans who visited Cyprus during the Frankish (1192-1489), the Venetian (1489-1571) and the Ottoman (1571-1878) periods, historical books of the sixteenth century written by the official historiographers of Venice, and a series of books regarding the "War of Cyprus" (1570-71).

The LEVENTIS MUNICIPAL MUSEUM OF LEFKOSIA is the historical museum of the capital of Cyprus and a unique museum in the presentation and interpretation of the Venetian Period of Cyprus. The Cornaro Gallery of the museum contains an important collection of paintings and drawings dedicated to Caterina Cornaro the Venetian Queen of Cyprus (1473-1489). Amongst the paintings there are two dedicated to the presentation of the Crown of Cyprus to the Venetian Doge Barbarigo (1489), an important sequence in the history of Cyprus since through this act the administration of the island is officially offered to the Venetian Republic. Special importance is also drawn on the commercial relations between Venice and Cyprus and to the construction of the Venetian walls of Lefkosia. The history of the Venetian walls of Lefkosia, which are considered prototype of the European renaissance military architecture, is depicted through a unique collection of maps of the city as well as through a multimedia interactive table. Last but not least is the presentation of the siege and fall of the city to the Ottomans (1570) which is depicted through publications, a treasure of precious vessels associated with Venetian officers of the period and other artifacts such as coins and engravings.

THE MANOR HOUSE AND IRRIGATION SYSTEM, POTAMIA.

Located about 25 km southeast of Lefkosia, Potamia village was particularly important under the Lusignan reign especially when James I (1389-1398) and Janus (1398-1432) built there a Manor House, the design of which was inspired by early Italian villas. Waterwheels, working day and night, fed tanks, cisterns, fountains and pipes in order to irrigate citrus orchards in such a way that one could admire a green landscape from the manor's loggia. This elegant and refined manor was a place of reception, appreciated by important foreign guests, who called it Bel Vedere. In 1426, the residence was burned down by the Mamelukes of Egypt and never recovered its former glory. Folk tales assert that Caterina Cornaro lived there, a point not confirmed by archive documents or by the archaeological excavations conducted by the French School at Athens. The manor, however, regained some of its economic prosperity from 1521 when the fief of Potamia was purchased by a wealthy and influential family of the Greek aristocracy in Cyprus, the Singlitico. Using the irrigation system developed by the Lusignan, they made Potamia the centre of a prosperous area and a source of considerable revenues.

Today we are left with the ruins of the manor house. In the surrounding countryside we have evidence of its prosperous past in particular in the remains of two water mills, the first in Archangelos (arriving by the road from

Fig.23 The oldest watermill of Cyprus at Agios Sozomenos (from the top)

Lefkosia, before crossing the river Yialias), the other one before Agios Sozomenos, near the bridge across the Alykos. This latter mill, built in the fourteenth century, was in operation until the eighteenth century and is probably the oldest and most monumental watermill of Cyprus where we still observe the aqueduct conveying water and the imposing forced waterline built in massive stones.

THE CHURCH OF AGIOS MAMAS, AGIOS SOZOMENOS

The Singlitico family did not only make economic investments in their fields at Potamia. They also built a church, which was probably never completed, and was to serve as a family funeral church. Named Agios Mamas, this church is located in the nearby village of Agios Sozomenos at the foot of the cliff hermitage where Agios Sozomenos was revered, a local saint whose cult was linked to the hope of resurrection after death.

The monument stands proudly on the edge of a village abandoned since 1964. It has lost its roof but there remain parts of the apse, walls, the pillars that separate the three naves and two doors. The building's architecture is of Gothic style but from a later period with inspiration from the great buildings of Lefkosia and Famagusta, without the elegance in the proportions of the great medieval monuments. Two large tombs were constructed in the south wall and decorated with columns and mouldings, the motifs of which clearly belong to the Renaissance repertoire. This church is one of very few examples of religious construction in Gothic style in the countryside. Presumably they were also linked to the donation of the painted panel above the tomb of the saint in the hermitage carved into the cliff overlooking the church and the village.

LARNAKA

Fig.25 Salt lakes in Larnaka known as Salt lakes of San Lazzaro during the Venetian time

Larnaka was just a large village in the sixteenth century the development of which depended on the SALT LAKES OF SAN LAZZARRO which provided the ballast for ships operating on the Levant trade. Apart from the galleys, boats loaded supplies of salt, the quality of which was appreciated in Venice. The exploitation of the two salt lakes, now abandoned, was an important source of revenue for Venice, and the spectacle of salt extraction was of interest to all travellers and pilgrims stopping in Cyprus.

Salt could be exploited almost everywhere along the Cypriot shores, the main centre of production was located here, near Larnaka, at this area called “Lakes of Saint Lazarus” where the two lakes had a circumference of more than 20 km. These lakes were not exploited according to the usual salt lakes system as the water which filled the lakes did not come from the sea but from two small torrents inland. Due to the proximity of the sea and the nature of the soil, the sun transformed the water to salt through evaporation during summertime; most of the travellers were amazed by the large salt surface of the lakes which contrasted to the usual small squares of the traditional Mediterranean salt lakes.

The salt extraction and trade were a State monopoly since Byzantine and Frankish times, and the Venetians continued this arrangement. All the Cypriots had to buy a certain amount of salt from the State and this tax brought regular incomes to the Treasury. Venice also required that all the Venetian ships bring back to Venice certain quantities of salt in order to sell them on the Northern Italian markets. By that measure, the salt extracted in Cyprus largely sustained the Venetian maritime trade between the Levant and Italy. The extraction was organised under the supervision of Venetian officials, who employed serfs with their donkeys. They had first to break the hard crust with picks, then cut them in large bricks and load them on the donkeys; the animals brought them directly to the shore where the sailors could load them on ship. At times when there were no ships, the blocks were stacked in huge pyramids near the coast, waiting for the next ships.

In Larnaka itself, there are no significant monuments from the Venetian period. However the Agios Lazaros church, a place of pilgrimage visited during the Middle Ages and the fort, built by the Ottomans on older structures, do have a Venetian connection. Additions and repairs in the southern arcade of AGIOS LAZAROS CHURCH were carried out in 1559 under the Provveditore of Cyprus Sebastian Vernier. In the CASTLE one can see the De Nores family Coat of arms and gravestones.

The collections of the PIERIDES MUSEUM MARFIN LAIKI FOUNDATION present some examples of Lapithos type ceramic cookware manufactured in the sixteenth century.

Fig.27 Medieval incised ceramics, Pierides Museum Marfin Laiki Bank Foundation, Larnaka
Fig.28 Interior of Agios Lazaros Church, Larnaka

Near the villages of Kiti and Pervolia, near the lighthouse, stands the most elegant VENETIAN WATCH TOWER of Cyprus, with low and wide proportions, with beautiful stonework in a square form. It has just one floor. We note especially the terrace with machicolations. Without windows, the tower was accessible via an upstairs door, the lintel of which is carved with a lion of St. Mark holding a sword and flanked by two coats-of-arms, like all buildings constructed on the initiative of Venetian officers.

AGIA NAPA

Fig.30 Agia Napa Monastery

THE MONASTERY OF AGIA NAPA

The village of Agia Napa, now a well known Mediterranean seaside resort, was a famous place in the late Middle Ages and the Renaissance: pilgrims went there to venerate a miraculous icon of the Virgin Mary in the church of the monastery that was dedicated to the Theotokos. Because of its coastal location, this place of worship attracted people coming from Famagusta as well as sailors and foreign merchants. A unique feature of this monastery was that it had services by both Greek and Latin priests, which shows the strength of attraction of the cult of the icon and the convergence of worship during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

The monastery is no longer isolated since it is surrounded by modern buildings, but it has preserved its enclosure that then protected it from attacks by pirates. The date of construction of the current building, which is not documented, probably goes back to the late fifteenth century, though its foundation was earlier, since the monastery is mentioned in the sources during the fourteenth century. Among the original characteristics of the monastic complex, one notices the combination of civil and religious architecture. The entrance to the monastery is through a door archway under a building comprising a ground and first floor. The first floor included external bays that were once loggias, closed today, indicating that this building was residential.

One notices a carved decoration, typical of the early Renaissance, particularly around the inner window with pilasters, columns and mouldings on jambs and arches.

After passing the main gate, one enters the courtyard of the monastery bathed in a peaceful lovely flowered atmosphere. The cloister, punctuated by beautiful arches in the typical popular Gothic style of Cyprus, has at its center an attractive fountain housed in a dome resting on four pillars: it is an octagonal watershed in travertine marble decorated with carved heads connected by garlands flower, a typical Renaissance motif, alternating with coats-of-arms and other motifs of popular style.

The small church, with roots dating back to Byzantine times, is built over an underground chamber carved into the rock; this is where the miraculous icon of the Virgin was displayed, beside a sacred spring (hagiasma). Within the church, there is a chapel, probably of Latin rite, adorned with late Gothic decoration, where one can distinguish a small rose window.

LEMESOS

Fig.33 Lemesos Castle

Lemesos has retained very few monuments of the Middle Ages and even less of the Renaissance. Only the CASTLE which defended the port is of interest. Built in the late twelfth century, it was repeatedly damaged during conflicts and dismantled by the Venetians after an Ottoman attack in 1538. It was fully re-built in the 1560s by Venetian military engineers. In order to withstand cannon fire, the entire building was surrounded by a thick wall. The castle now houses the CYPRUS MEDIEVAL MUSEUM where the finest collection of tombstones and other artefacts of the island are exhibited. In the hall on the ground floor, one sees in particular some examples of graves illustrating the diffusion of Italian customs in Cypriot society such as the grave of Ioannis Yafounis (d. 1558), a man of influence, wearing traditional Cypriot clothes in a late gothic frame. Two years earlier (1556), the tomb of Akylina Smerleni presents an epitaph on a scroll around skull and bones, according to Italian prototypes unrelated to the Byzantine aesthetics. In other rooms of the museum, different kinds of sixteenth century pottery are exhibited, some imported majolica ware from North or Central Italy but also glazed ware from Lapithos, painted with vibrant colours that recall Italian majolica.

SUGAR PRODUCTION MILL, EPISKOPI

During the Middle Ages and the Venetian rule Episkopi was a major center of sugar production owned by the Venetian family of Cornaro from 1363. Structures and investments there included a four-level palace, a sugar refinery and many store-houses. The surrounding land was irrigated by an ingenious water system (aqueducts, fountains, canals).

This complex of houses and industrial buildings, mostly known through the archives, has not left many traces. Excavations conducted by the Department of Antiquities at a place called Serayia in the southern part of the village brought to light foundations of an impressive watermill, as demonstrated by the dimensions of the mill-stone for grinding sugar cane. All around, one can still see fragments of moulds used to form the sugar loaves that were placed in the Venetian market.

PAFOS

Fig.36 Wall painting, Agios Neofytos Monastery, Katholikon, Pafos

Similarly, there are no Renaissance monuments in Pafos. The Fort at the harbour's entrance, although built by the Lusignan and constantly reinforced by the Venetians, was entirely rebuilt by the Ottomans following demolitions in 1570. In the two town museums we can find items from the time of Venetian rule. In the PAFOS DISTRICT ARCHAEOLOGICAL MUSEUM, a rare piece of Renaissance sculpture representing four tallish angels supporting a canopy, is exhibited. It comes from the Franciscan church in Pafos. At the BYZANTINE MUSEUM, many icons of the Virgin show direct Italian Renaissance influence through the art of her portraits (Panagia Deomeni from Kato Archimandrita, Panagia Philochiotissa from Philousa Kelokedaron). The portraits of the donors on the lower register of the icon of Agios Ioannis Theologos are also good testimonies of the Venetian fashion in the remote village of Agios Nikolaos (1562).

THE CHURCH OF PANAGIA CHRYSSELOUSA, EMPA

The village of Empa, about 3 km from the coast of Pafos, was in the late Middle Ages a major centre of sugar production, under the ownership of the royal domain of the Lusignan. The great Byzantine church, dedicated to the Virgin Chryseleousa, located near the centre of the village, was built in the twelfth century and is characterised by two domes that dominate it. Its nave received abundant decoration in the late fifteenth century.

The main dome has kept a strong representation of Christ Pantocrator surrounded by angels, archangels and prophets, all having been executed by an artist who was true to the style of Palaeologian painting. Other panels of the nave, chronicling the life of Christ, reflect the same artistic movement.

However, the icons placed on the gilded wood sixteenth century iconostasis are in a completely different style. The main icon of Christ was executed by the painter Titos in 1536; close to it, we see the two panels of the twelve Apostles, executed with a skilled Italo-Byzantine style, whose faces refer to idealized Venetian prototypes; these panels were ordered by two Italian or Italian-Cypriot families whose coats-of-arms are painted at the bottom. Another coat-of-arms, painted above the north-east door of the church, shows how the principle of artistic patronage was then prevalent among the elite living on the island until the Ottoman conquest.

THE MONASTERY OF AGIOS NEOFYTOS NEAR TALA

The monastery of Agios Neofytos, 15 km north of Pafos, near the village of Tala, is a prestigious religious institution founded back in the 1160s when Saint Neofytos dug a hermitage into the cliffside in order to spend there a holy life; paintings that decorate the Enkleistra are among the masterpieces of Byzantine painting, particularly representative of the art of the Comnenian period.

The monastery was built at a much later time, near the end of the fifteenth century or early sixteenth as regards the katholikon. The church, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, has the form of a large basilica with three naves, which includes a large number of paintings executed during the first half of the sixteenth century. In such a conservative spiritual center of Orthodoxy, the decoration followed the rules of Byzantine iconography, as evidenced by all the paintings, especially in the northern vault which contains the cycle of 24 panels drawn from the Akathistos Hymnos.

This theme, also represented in the “Latin Chapel” of Agios Ioannis Lampadistis at Kalopanagiotis, is treated according to the principles of Byzantine iconography but there, the artists added specific features from Italian painting. In the Katholikon of Agios Neofytos, painters remain faithful to the sixteenth century Byzantine style which finds here its most refined expression with an elegant design used by a skillful use of colour.

Rare traces of Italian influence are seen in the Katholikon with clearer influence in some decoration, as seen in plant and floral Renaissance motifs, in the bands that surround the saints represented above the iconostasis. This detail confirms that the painters who worked in Agios Neofytos knew the Italian models, perhaps through the “Latin Chapel” of Kalopanagiotis. One, therefore, concludes that they are turning away from Italian aesthetic formulas by respecting the Byzantine tradition, and that this is a deliberate reaction against the innovations from the West.

THE CHURCH OF AGIA EKATERINI NEAR KRITOU TERRA

Near the village of Kritou Terra (about 4 km east of the village), we find one of the most astonishing churches built in the Cypriot countryside at the end of the fifteenth century-beginning of the sixteenth century. It is believed to have been a dependent monastery of St. Catherine in the Sinai until the end of the nineteenth century. The church of Agia Ekaterini is unique in its architecture, as the narthex is open, like a portico, and domed with three cupols.

The arcades remind those of the inner courtyard at Agia Napa which shows how different influences (local Gothic, Byzantine and Renaissance) could mix together in a remote place. Unfortunately, most of the frescoes of that period disappeared after the 1953 earthquake.

THE CHURCH OF ARCHANGELOS MICHAEL, CHOLI

The church of the Archangel Michael is located high on the outskirts of the village of Choli. It is unique as it is built against a watchtower that was part of the defence system of the Chrysochrou Bay which includes Pyrgos tis Rigainas in the Akamas. The tower dates from the late fifteenth or early sixteenth century, the same as the church which is decorated with frescoes painted in a provincial and late Byzantine style.

TROODOS AREA

Fig.43 Church of Metamorphosis tou Sotiros, Palaichori

THE CHURCH OF METAMORPHOSIS TOS SOTIROS, PALAICHORI

The village of Palaichori is located on the slopes of Mount Papoutsia in the Pitsilia area. In the Middle Ages, it was already a rich fief which was successively owned by the Lusignan, the Ibelin family, the military order of the Hospital of St. John, the family of the Counts of Edessa de Grenier and, finally, by the Commune of Venice. As might be expected, these great families left traces of their patronage in the local churches, one dedicated to the Metamorphosis tou Sotiros (Transfiguration of the Saviour) and one dedicated to Panagia Chrysopantanassa.

On the top of a hill, the Church of the Metamorphosis tou Sotiros, sheltered by a large roof as is common in the Troodos, dominates the site. The interior has maintained an extensive programme of frescoes including cycles from the New Testament and some scenes from the Old Testament with representations of military saints and holy monks. The style of these paintings belongs to the late Byzantine tradition of the early sixteenth century and is comparable to those performed by Symeon Afxentis in the church of Agios Sozomenos in Galata. Very few stylistic elements borrowed from Italian art are seen in the Resurrection of Christ.

THE CHURCH OF PANAGIA CHRYSOPANTANASSA, PALAICHORI.

A totally different perspective is adopted in the church of Panagia Chrysopantanassa located in Palaichori village center. Frescoes are preserved in the upper parts of walls and on arches separating the three naves. The iconographic program includes the Marian cycle and the Christological one, scenes related to the Invention and the Exaltation of the Holy Cross, scenes from the life of Saint Nicholas, as well as figures of Prophets and Saints, and even personification of virtues.

The variety of topics is served by a strong sense of staging where groups of people are settled in sophisticated architecture. The artists were particularly careful in expressing the feelings of love and tenderness that Anne and Joachim show to the Virgin. The scenes are often animated by the actions of characters and a taste for detail; several scenes depicting the life of Saint Nicholas offer without any doubt the most beautiful portraits of traders and extraordinary performances of merchant ships of the sixteenth century. As in Saint Ioannis Prodromos at Askas, the artists knew the models of the Italian Renaissance and were heavily inspired by them. The series of female portraits personifying the seven virtues, smoothly links Byzantine tradition with Italian modernity. Among the church's icons, we note in particular the one of the Enthroned Virgin and Child, dated at 1506, where the donor Cherubina of Acre is kneeling on the left of Mary, while the inscription of the dedication is written on a long scroll on the right side.

Palaichori also houses, THE BYZANTINE HERITAGE MUSEUM that deserves to be visited. Among the many icons of the sixteenth century, we note the cross and the cresting of an iconostasis where the movements of the Virgin and St. John depart from the Byzantine tradition. Several liturgical objects of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries enrich the collections: antidoron dishes, including a copper one bearing an inscription in German Gothic, another one in bronze decorated in the center with a woman holding a scroll; other objects such as chalice, a paten, a phiale and a processional cross belong to the same period and which demonstrate the richness of village churches in the Renaissance when they received metalwork manufactured in Cyprus or imported from Germany and Italy. The liturgical books used by the village priests-displayed in windows-were still brought from Venice during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

THE CHURCH OF AGIOS IOANNIS PRODROMOS, ASKAS

In this traditional village in the Pitsillia area of Troodos there is a stunning sixteenth century church the paintings of which have recently been cleaned by London's Courtauld Institute of Art. The church is dedicated to Agios Ioannis Prodromos.

Fig.48 Processional Cross, Byzantine Heritage Museum, Palaichori

Fig.49 Antidoron dish, Byzantine Heritage Museum, Palaichori

Its exterior offers no particular interest in the manner the building was restored lately. In contrast, the paintings, probably dating from the mid-sixteenth century due to their style, are attractive as they demonstrate knowledge of specific models of the Italian Renaissance. Most of the frescoes are displayed on the arches and columns separating the three naves. The series of saints and holy men and women represented in Renaissance frames on the columns and pillars are among the finest portraits of Cypriot painting of the sixteenth century.

There are several series of attractive paintings, notably those that are a chronicle of the life of Agios Ioannis Prodromos. We note first the great vitality of the scenes where the characters wear varied, refined and coloured costumes (Annunciation to Zacharias, Banquet of Herodias), and in the architectural designs which include perspective (Visitation). The panels showing the public life of Christ are equally developed (Miracle at Cana, Jesus and the Woman of Samaria). The compositions display often the scene of dialogue between several characters by calling each other with vivid and expressive gestures (Healing of the blind, Pentecost).

We admire the profusion of often picturesque details in some panels: the guests at dinner in the Parable of the rich and the beggar Lazarus, fish, octopus and crabs returning the heads of the drowned in the scene of the Last Judgment and, finally, one shall not fail to observe the rare scene of the naked couple in bed, thrown to the flames of hell because it is sleeping instead of going to Mass on Sunday; this warning to the faithful recalls the central role of painting in spreading religious morality. Thus, the Church of Agios Ioannis Prodromos shows the dynamism of social relations in a remote mountainous area, served by artists mastering the Renaissance techniques.

THE CHURCH OF AGIA CHRISTINA, ASKAS

Near the village of Askas, towards Fterikoudi, we find an isolated chapel amidst the terraces of olive trees, dedicated to Agia Christina (locally also known as Agia Paraskevi), whose inscription of 1518 allows us to date the figurative decoration. Several panels of frescoes around the bema show that the Byzantine iconographic tradition remains strong in this region in the early sixteenth century while also exhibiting the influence of Italian painting. Thus, one can observe in the apse the treatment of coloured masses in the large panel of the Virgin surrounded by two archangels, or dynamic gestures and architecture represented in the Annunciation in the pediment. The decoration of the chapel of Agia Christina, made about forty years before the one in Agios Ioannis Prodromos, shows how the vitality of the artistic currents of the Renaissance reached the remotest areas of the island in the mountains.

THE CHURCH OF TIMIOS STAVROS, KYPEROUNTA AND THE MUSEUM

The church of Timios Stavros, located on a hill in the centre of the village, was one of the numerous places of worship dedicated to the Holy Cross during the Middle Ages. Inside the north side wall of the church, a whole cycle of narrative paintings recall the history of the discovery of the Holy Cross in Jerusalem by Saint Helena. Painted in 1521, those frescoes are executed according to the Byzantine local style but Renaissance influence is rather evident in the four panels displayed on either side of the iconostasis, where the Evangelists are surrounded by sophisticated architectures which shows that the painters were aware of models brought by stamped books. The entrance of the church, opposite to the bema, is converted into a small museum containing icons and liturgical books, some dating to the sixteenth century.

THE CHURCH OF PANAGIA KATHOLIKI, PELENDRI

Pelendri was an important village in the Middle Ages and a centre of royal bailiwick and until Venetian rule its economy was based on viticulture and gardening. The Church of Timios Stavros is amongst the most interesting ones of the Lusignan period. In the sixteenth century, the church seems to have been expanded to the south with a nave containing some painted panels, but their quality is not comparable to that of the other frescoes in the other village church, dedicated to Panagia Katholiki. This church is protected by a steep tiled roof. The interior is divided into three naves by wooden arcades. On the upper parts of the west wall, we see a Last Judgement the composition of which is rather unusual in its design and technique according to Cypriot standards of the same period compared to similar scenes on the same subject. The iconography is still linked to the traditional Byzantine composition with the distribution around the Preparation of the Throne of the different groups of people (Apostles, Prophets, Saints), and the representation of hell below, on the right side. The style is more influenced by Italian technique with a light and precise design of the faces and dresses and the use of nuanced colours. The details of the Judgement of the Souls show deeper Italian influence as the wild black demons and the naked bodies of the damned are painted with an uncommon sense of physical features. Moreover, on the whole fresco, all the figures are animated with delicate gestures and vivid expression in the eyes.

On the wood-carved, gilded and painted iconostasis of the church, about fifty icons belong to the same school of Italo-Byzantine painting of the sixteenth century, some of them repainted at a later time. The famous icon of the Virgin, known as Panagia ton Konnaron, looks like a humanistic portrait of a young mother with her child. Other despotic icons show Saints standing with elegant expression, as the icon of Agios Mamas where the young shepherd has a rather unusual appearance - a little provocative - sitting in a supernatural way on the back of a lion that looks more like the emblem of Venice than the stereotyped lion represented by the Byzantine artists. Most of the icons related to religious feast cycles present the same aspects, some introducing in the background sophisticated architecture which remind us of similar Italian prototypes, as in the Presentation to the Temple or in the Entry into Jerusalem. Finally, near the iconostasis, there is another panel of high quality, the Deisis. Once again, even following the Byzantine iconography, the painter creates a totally new atmosphere using design and colours with a manneristic touch that gives the faithful a strong feeling of humanism.

THE CHURCH OF PANAGIA IAMATIKI, ARAKAPAS

The church of Panagia Iamatiki is located at the eastern end of the village in a hilly area planted with vines and orchards. The wood and tile roofed church has two doors to the south and the west and Gothic arches typical of the Franco-Byzantine style. Inside, the visitor notices the three naves separated by arches adorned with paintings dating from the mid-sixteenth century.

Although the upper part of the murals have been destroyed, on the arches and columns remain high-quality representations of the twelve Apostles, Evangelists, and some scenes depicting the lives of Saints. The ornaments give this church a unique place in the history of Renaissance painting in Cyprus. The backing decorative floral patterns follow the ribs of arches and columns. Among these ornaments, one will notice the garlands, with acanthus and palm leaves, entwined with broad red ribbon drawing frames and, on several occasions, these tapes adorn frames in which angels are painted. This particular feature is borrowed from the Italian Renaissance, showing that the painters knew well the stylistic trends of their times and that they could easily use them.

THE CHURCH OF PANAGIA THEOTOKOS, KAKOPETRIA

Kakopetria, a resort known for its cool climate and plentiful waters, contains several religious monuments of great interest. In addition to the monastery of Agios Nikolaos tis Stegis, with its precious frescoes of the twelfth to fourteenth centuries in the Byzantine tradition, we have the church dedicated to Panagia Theotokos, which is located at the entrance of the village, arriving from Galata. The dedicatory inscription informs that this church was built in a monastery founded in 1520 by the cleric Leontios, shown with his wife Lucretia in a panel above the front door. In this panel the artist shows his mastery of portrait and emphasises the details of costumes. We also note that the clothes of Leontios and of his wife Lucretia, follow Venetian fashion as in the church of Archangelos at Galata, decorated a few years earlier. The taste for new patterns from Italy is, however, combined with a loyalty to late Byzantine iconographic style, as are most scenes in the nave that are not inspired by models of the Renaissance.

Fig.57 Church of Panagia Iamatiki, Arakapas

THE CHURCH OF AGIOS SOZOMENOS, GALATA

In the Solea valley, the village of Galata is worth a longer visit, because there are three important churches built and decorated in the sixteenth century that are very similar in their external appearance but different in their interiors. The church of Agios Sozomenos is located in the village centre, while the other two, those of Archangelos (or Panagia Theotokos) and Panagia Podithou, are located before the village when arriving from Lefkosia and the Evrychou main road. The church of Agios Sozomenos is typical of Troodos, with a wood and tile sloping roof that protects the church and the exonarthex. Above the west door, a long inscription relates the construction and decoration of the building to a group of thirteen founders on the 3rd of September 1513. Most of the frescoes were executed by the artist Symeon Afxentis who composed several cycles (Life of Christ, apocryphal cycle of the Life of the Virgin, cycle of St. George) with many portraits of holy men and women. Afxentis' style is very close to the Byzantine tradition in his iconographic types and technique, as seen in portraits of military Saints (Georgios, Nestor, Demetrios) that are loyal to Byzantine prototypes, but they are executed with elegance. In a few cases, the artist can be inspired by western models, for example in the scene of the Resurrection when Christ leaves the empty sarcophagus, guarded by soldiers who have fallen asleep. Nevertheless, Afxentis remains true to the tradition of the Byzantine Church celebrating its history by representing the seven major early Ecumenical councils and the Triumph of Orthodoxy in the exonarthex, on the northern wall.

Fig.62 Church of Panagia Podithou, Galata

THE CHURCH OF PANAGIA PODITHOU, GALATA

The church of Panagia Podithou is the only preserved building of a monastic complex the history of which is unknown. The dedicatory inscription denotes that the church was founded in 1502 by Dimitrios de Koron who belongs to a family of officers who served the Lusignan. His portrait, and that of his wife Helen, are represented in the scene of the Foreshadows of the Virgin. The church contains some of the most beautiful frescoes painted in Cyprus during the Renaissance. In the upper part of the western facade, the Foreshadows of the Virgin, show the Virgin and the Child surrounded by ten prophets represented in medallions made of green branches with long leaves, according to iconographic forms of Italian art that we also find in the "Latin Chapel" at Kalopanagiotis.

The most impressive scene, unique in Cyprus, is undoubtedly the Crucifixion, inside the nave, on the west wall. The artist transforms the scene of traditional Christian iconography in a dramatic picture where the death of Christ takes a historical dimension. A lively crowd of expressive characters is surging around the cross; we distinguish in particular a group of women supporting the Holy Virgin, painted with an Italian inspiration, Saint John shaken by a deep sadness, groups of soldiers and people on horseback or foot, in brightly coloured costumes, surrounded by weapons and banners. The iconography used by the painters who worked at Podithou shows that models of the Italian Renaissance easily circulated among the artistic circles of the island, which reproduced them with imagination.

THE CHURCH OF ARCHANGELOS, GALATA

The Church of Archangelos, otherwise known as Panagia Theotokos, was also decorated by the painter Symeon Afxentis in 1514, that is to say one year after the church of Agios Sozomenos. The donor of the church, Polos Zacharias, is represented on a dedicatory panel above the north gate. It deserves attention in that it presents the usual scene of the Deisis, before which the donor's family kneel and where Polos is shown dressed in black, offering the model of his church to Christ. We see Madelena, his wife, and their three daughters in elegant dresses with deep squared necklines, precious embroidery and silk and beads according to Venetian fashion. This is, therefore, a fine example of a family adopting a Venetian way of life while remaining faithful to the Orthodox rite and Byzantine aesthetics.

AGIOS IOANNIS LAMPADISTIS AND MUSEUM, KALOPANAGIOTIS

Since the twelfth-thirteenth centuries, the village of Kalopanagiotis houses one of the largest monasteries of Troodos, that of Agios Ioannis Lampadistis. The attraction of the cult of the local saint remains partly mysterious, but it quickly won over the Franks since the Lusignan have left traces of their patronage on the iconostasis of the oldest church of the monastery dedicated to Agios Irakleidios. Each historical period brings evidence of the common worship of both Greeks and Latins especially during the sixteenth century, when a chapel adjoined to the church was adorned with an original and rich decoration. Today, the art historians consider this "Latin Chapel" as one of the masterpieces of the Renaissance in Cyprus, even if the chapel was probably never served by priests of the Latin rite. This chapel is contiguous to two other churches, Agios Irakleidios church and Agios Ioannis Lampadistis church. The chapel is remarkable for the height of the nave covered by a semicircular vault, with large painted surfaces, following a common Italian architectural design. All the iconographic programme is devoted to specific topics of Byzantine religious painting. We note in particular that the Akathyst Hymn, sung in the Orthodox Church in honour of the Virgin, provides the subject of the frescoes of the northern and southern walls of the chapel, where the 24 scenes are inspired by the 24 stanzas of this hymn. Among the first 12 stanzas devoted to the childhood of Jesus, those of the Annunciation and Nativity show the influence of Italian painting in the gestures of the characters and the shape of their costumes. The Tree of Jesse on the western wall is devoted to the genealogy of the Virgin and combines faces represented in medallions connected to the trunk with branches; we notice the presence of many prophets holding scrolls where citations related to Mary are written. Very few scenes in Cypriot painting of the Renaissance depict so clearly literate culture. Further details are inspired by Italian painting, as on the two panels of Moses receiving the Tablets of the Law, and Moses before the burning bush, where landscapes lose the symbolic rigidity of Byzantine painting and acquire the traits of figurative Venetian painting.

The roof, finally, deserves special attention because it incorporates several features of the decoration of Italian Renaissance churches; the arch that divides the vault carries 12 medallions of saints made in sets of acanthus leaves; on each side of this arch, the spaces are divided by two diagonal painted lines, formed with floral bands and geometric interlacing. The other framing of 12 quadrifoiled medallions of Apostles on the blue stand is reminiscent of the wooden frames of paintings decorating churches in Italy. All the decoration of the vault based on geometric or floral patterns shows how the painter was careful with details; the garlands are rows of green leaves topped with peaches, quince, pear, red ribbons, white flowers and can highlight the technical mastery of the artists giving the illusion of garlands in relief.

THE MUSEUM, located in a special separate building inside the monastic complex, contains old and interesting icons. Most were painted during the thirteenth-fourteenth centuries but some of them are from a later period. The exhibited sanctuary doors are of special interest.

THE CHURCH OF CHRYSOKOURDALIOTISSA, KOURDALI

Along the winding road through the valley descending from the village of Spilia, one reaches Kourdali, built around the monastery dedicated to the Dormition of the Virgin Mary. It was founded by the deacon Kourdalis and his wife at an unknown date during the sixteenth century. A large part of the frescoes have disappeared, but several panels on the bema and especially on the western wall remain, showing several interesting scenes.

There are compositions from the cycles of the New Testament, including two scenes of the Resurrection: one follows the canons of the Byzantine tradition, the other one draws its inspiration from the Italian tradition with Christ leaving the empty sarcophagus guarded by soldiers who have fallen asleep (as in the church of Agios Sozomenos at Galata). The Crucifixion presents also many similarities with the one in the church of Panagia Podithou at Galata. In both cases, the contribution of Renaissance painting is emphasised in the Virgin's expression of physical pain, the rough attitude of characters and the presence of soldiers on horseback. In the Incredulity of Thomas, the architecture is also represented according to western style. The decoration of the church reveals the penetration of the Renaissance aesthetics in the deepest valleys of the Troodos in the middle of the sixteenth century.

THE CHURCH OF ARCHANGELOS MICHAEL AND THE BYZANTINE MUSEUM , PEDOULAS

The small church of Archangelos Michael in Pedoulas contains one of the oldest iconostasis of Cyprus bearing the Lusignan coat-of-arms, indicating that the church was placed under royal patronage. The inscription on the west wall reports the construction and decoration of the building in 1474, that is to say the precise year when Venice established its power on the island through the Queen Caterina Cornaro. The donor, the priest Basil, is depicted over the door with his wife and their two daughters in a scene of great simplicity in which we note the elaborate costumes of the women which stand out in their rich embroidery. No detail in the clothes evokes western fashion, and there is no Italian influence, the artists following the Byzantine tradition.

The Byzantine Museum next to the church, exhibits significant precious icons of the medieval period, as well as several liturgical books printed in Venice in the eighteenth century, reflecting the close ties that continued to link Cyprus to Venice during the Ottoman period.

THE KYKKOS MONASTERY AND MUSEUM

The most important monastery of Cyprus, Our Lady of Kykkos, was founded during the twelfth century but the Byzantine foundation had no real economic or political influence during the Lusignan and the Venetian periods.

Most of the actual buildings of the monastic complex were built during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, as several fires damaged the original structures.

Apart from its importance, the monastery houses one of the main museums of the island, where some objects are linked to the Renaissance period such as icons, dishes and the wood-carved ornamentation of the sixteenth century iconostasis. Among the most interesting pieces is a wood-carved cross, probably made in 1545 by George Lascaris, which can be considered as a masterpiece of micro-sculpture, including scenes from the Old and the New Testament inserted in Late Gothic - Early Renaissance architecture. Engravings and liturgical books printed in Venice during the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries are displayed in other windows showing the strong cultural relationship that Kykkos maintained with Italy after the Ottoman conquest. It is, therefore, not surprising that the first book relating to the history of the monastery was published abroad in 1751, precisely by Venetian printers.

BRIDGES: ELIA, KELEFOS, ROUDIAS

Several bridges of medieval and modern periods survive, without being possible to determine precisely their dating; on the one hand, these monuments do not bear inscriptions with chronology and, on the other hand, they were built using techniques that little changed over the centuries. They are characterised by large pointed arches spanning the river courses. Three bridges are located in an attractive forested area on the south side of the Troodos mountains, away from modern highways. These are the bridges of Elia, south of Kaminaria and west of Foini, of Kelefos, about 4 kilometres west of the bridge of Elia, and that of Roudias, a further 8 km west of Kelefos.

VENICE

Fig.83 Loggetta (detail), Saint Mark's Square, Venice

A major centre of Hellenism during the end of the Middle Ages and especially after 1453, Venice has attracted a large number of Cypriots for many centuries; it was often servants, simple soldiers, craftsmen and merchants whose names and specific activities are unknown. Most often, they were assimilated into the Greek community of the city and were not organised in a 'national' independent group. This institutional status explains the difficulty in tracing Cypriots who lived in Venice because most were integrated either into the Greek community (officially recognised by the Venetian State in 1528) in the case of individuals of modest social status, or in the Venetian society, in the case of the aristocratic elite. The first evidence is a code-of-arms engraved in stone commemorating the relationship between Venice and Cyprus is on the LOREDAN PALACE, located on the Grand Canal, which nowadays houses some offices of the municipality of the city (on the Riva del Carbon that is to say, on the right bank of the Grand Canal, south of the Rialto Bridge, 500 meters from the vaporetto stop). This palace, probably founded in the twelfth century, retains the look of very old veneto-byzantine palaces, in spite of the clumsy restorations that occurred in the nineteenth century and the construction of the two upper floors. Its portico on the canal and the loggia on the first floor have preserved their original columns and capitals, and the main door of the side entrance is always surmounted by the Coat of arms of one branch of the Cornaro family, who got from King Peter I of Lusignan the fief of Episkopi in 1363. In this emblem are engraved the arms of the Lusignan, those of the the Kingdom of Jerusalem and, in the middle, the sword and the scroll on which was usually engraved the motto of the Order of the Sword which was founded by Peter I.

Thanks to the privilege granted by the King of Cyprus, the family took the name of Cornaro-Piscopia, which is what allowed the distinction from the other branches of the family, particularly from the one to which Caterina Cornaro belonged. The palace belonged to the family until the early eighteenth century and Elena Lucrezia Corner-Piscopia (1646-1684), a woman of great erudition who became the first woman university graduate on 25th of June 1678, after studying philosophy at Padua. In the eighteenth century, the palace was in the possession of the Loredan family and was then acquired by the municipality of Venice in 1868.

Caterina Cornaro is without any doubt the historical figure who embodies the closest relationship that Venice maintained with Cyprus. Caterina generated a particular pride in Venice. When she became Queen she achieved a status which no Venetian lady could dream of, at a time when the highest honour reserved for women was to become the wife of the Doge (Dogaressa). However, in spite of her royal title, Caterina has not left many tangible records in Venice.

In the official history of the city, Caterina Cornaro is celebrated for having offered the Kingdom of Cyprus to Venice in 1489. This, which enabled Venice to expand its colonial domain, is recalled in two bas-reliefs. The first one is in the Dominican church of SAINTS JOHN AND PAUL (Giovanni e Paolo), included in the monument of Doge Pietro Mocenigo (d. 1476), which is on the back side of the front entrance (on the right side). This white marble monument is considered as one of the masterpieces of the sculptor Pietro Lombardo, for the balance of its architecture, the elegant proportions of the volumes and the fineness of the carving. This official tomb emphasises the military prowess of the Doge whose feature in ducal dress is reminiscent of warriors dressed in the manner of ancient Rome. On the sarcophagus, two scenes represent the most important events of the Doge's reign: on the left side, the entry of the Venetians in Smyrna in 1471, and on the right side, Caterina Cornaro handing over the keys of Famagusta, where the city is represented in the background, under the form of classical architecture. The second relief associated with Caterina Cornaro represents the same event and is located on the centre of the funeral monument erected in honour of the Queen of Cyprus, in the right transept of the church of SAN SALVATORE (central district of Rialto), above the entrance to the sacristy. This monument was erected in the early 1580s by architect Bernardino Contino, more than seventy years after the death of the Queen (10th of July, 1510), and Caterina is represented as a woman draped in the antique manner, granting to the Doge the model of a city, being accompanied by young women with voluptuous forms that evoke the island of Aphrodite. At the foot of the monument, a slab of white veined marble bears the inscription: Catarina Corneliae Cypri, Hierosolymorum, ac Armeniae Reginae Cineres (ashes of Caterina Cornaro, Queen of Cyprus, Jerusalem and Armenia).

Fig.86 Doge Pietro Mocenigo Monument, Saint John and Paul Church, Venice

This plaque marks in fact the second burial of the Queen because she was buried in the chapel of the family Cornaro attached to the church of SANTI APOSTOLI (district of Canareggio, 300 metres from Rialto Bridge going to the station). The chapel of the family has not preserved any memory of the Queen but houses the tombs of Caterina's father, Marco Cornaro (who died in 1511) and of her brother Giorgio (died in 1540) who were consistent supporters of the Queen when she went through difficult years. The celebration of this unique queen related to the Republic of Venice inspired considerable literature that contributed to building a myth around Caterina Cornaro. Several painters have represented her, including Gentile Bellini and Titian, the former's portrait displayed in Budapest and the latter's in Florence. In Venice, Caterina Cornaro appears in an idealised fashion in the Solemn landing in Venice of the Queen of Cyprus who came granting her kingdom to the Commune. This huge canvas painted by Antonio Vassilacchi, as said by Aliense (Milos ca 1556-Venice 1629), is hanging in Hall VI of the CORRER MUSEUM. Executed a long time after the death of the Queen, it depicts Caterina Cornaro arriving in Venice and hosted in the midst of festivities. There is speculation but no proof, that the Queen is amongst the ladies of the Venetian aristocracy attending the Miracle of the Cross fall into the canal of San Lorenzo, painted by Gentile Bellini in 1500, exhibited in the Hall XX of the GALLERY OF THE ACADEMY. Despite the reputation acquired by Caterina Cornaro after her death, the Queen of Cyprus did not attract much interest among artists during her lifetime. Her name was later given to the family palace, a building located on the Grand Canal and renovated from 1724. This is where Caterina was born in 1454, CORRER DELLA REGINA PALACE, on the left bank of the Grand Canal, at the corner of the Rio San Cassiano, opposite the Ca 'd'Oro. Whatever the role of Caterina Cornaro was in granting Cyprus to Venice, the Signoria managed a very important political coup by integrating the Kingdom of Lusignan in its colonial domain. Accordingly, this peaceful conquest was celebrated in the urban setting where the Venetian power featured its potency, namely on the Piazza San Marco. The reconstruction of the LOGGETTA located at the foot of the campanile of St. Mark in the years 1537-1549, provided an opportunity to demonstrate publicly the political hegemony of Venice in the Mediterranean world. The Loggetta was designed by Jacopo Sansovino (1486-1570), the great Florentine architect to whom the Signoria had assigned the St. Mark Library building during the same years. Sansovino gave to the Loggetta the appearance of a small monument inspired by ancient architecture, with three profusely decorated arches. In the four niches Sansovino put up bronze statues of Minerva, Apollo, Mercury and Peace that he made between 1540 and 1545. On the upper register, he arranged three bas-reliefs in marble illustrating the official ideology. So, one finds in the middle an allegory of Venice as a woman dispensing justice with a sword in her right hand and a balance in her left, and flanked by two lions. The relief on the left is an allegory of the island of Crete, while the one on the right represents the island of Cyprus, personified by the goddess Aphrodite. In the heart of the city, Cyprus is seen closely associated with its patroness, the Signoria, offering it legendary beauty, a glorious past and an ancient culture. This allegorical representation was partially true because, near the Loggetta, the ST. MARK LIBRARY deserves to be regarded as a repository of literary culture of Cyprus. The building, the construction of which was initiated in 1537 by Jacopo Sansovino (completed only in 1588), houses the collections of Greek manuscripts donated by Cardinal Bessarion, and also includes several valuable texts for the history of Cypriot culture. During the sixteenth century the manuscripts of George Bustron's and Leontios Machaira's chronicles, the collection of Petrarchist love poems and legal codes of feudal times were added. A tradition of scholarship has linked Venice to Cyprus and, not surprisingly, two scholars of Cypriot origin became curators of the St. Mark Library in the seventeenth century: Giovanni Sozomeno (1626-1632) and Giovanni Matteo Bustron (1659-1667). The St. Mark Library is not the only institution owning texts and documents essential to the cultural history of Cyprus: the State Archives (housed in the monastery buildings of the Frari church) and the collections of the Correr Museum contain priceless documents, such as the Museo Navale, where two wooden models of Famagusta from the mid-sixteenth century are exhibited.

Another important figure in the Cypriot culture of the Renaissance was to Jacopo Sansovino who was assigned the task of creating the monument of Cardinal Livio Podocataro who died in 1555 and whose grave is located in the church of SAN SEBASTIANO (in the district of Dorsoduro, near the Zattere). In this church which owes its fame to the cycles of paintings by Paolo Veronese, the monument of Livio Podocataro, completed between 1557-1565, reveals itself as a minor work of Sansovino, with its massive proportions and too sober decoration (notice the arms of the Podocataro family in the lower register). However, it is worth recalling the essential role played by the cardinal who belonged to a powerful aristocratic family in Cyprus, whose members attended the University of Padua since the mid-fifteenth century and were often of Latin rite. Before his death, Cardinal Livio Podocataro instituted a foundation in order to allow three young students from Cyprus to study in Padua. This institution functioned until the late eighteenth century and offered a framework to maintain permanent relations between the elite of the island and Venice, throughout the period of Ottoman rule over Cyprus. A last major figure of Cypriot hellenism notable at a slightly later time is Thomas Flanghini (1579-1648). Cypriot by his mother, Corfiot by his father, Flanghini belonged to a merchant family whose social ascent was marked by its admission to the Venetian patrician during the seventeenth century. Two palaces are connected with the family. The first one, the FLANGHINI PALACE, was the family residence on the Grand Canal, next to the church of San Geremia, built during the last quarter of the seventeenth century, to which the architect Giuseppe Sardi gave a balanced facade; the other one is located in the Castello district, behind the church of San Zaccaria. Since 1953 it is seat of the ISTITUTO DI STUDI ELLENICO BIZANTINI E POSTBIZANTINI DI VENEZIA (Hellenic Institute of Venice of Byzantine and Post-Byzantine Studies), an institution depending on the Greek State. A lawyer and wealthy merchant, Thomas Flanghini left in his will to the benefit of the Greek Community of Venice a huge sum of money (170.000 ducats) in order to create a school for educating the young Greeks, to give dowries to poor Greek girls, and to establish a Greek hospital. After his death, this amount was used to buy some estates near the Greek church of St. George, CHIESA DI SAN GIORGIO DI GRECI and to build two houses. One became the main building of the Greek Confraternity (Scoletta) and where the first level was organized as an hospital. The second building housed the Flanghinian College, now Hellenic Institute, which operated for 132 years, admitting about 600 students. Both constructions were designed by the famous Venetian architect Baldassare Longhena for an expense of 14.000 ducats.

This College was the second important achievement of the Greek Confraternity, after the construction of the church dedicated to St. George, the construction of which started in 1539. Among the various artists employed on the decoration of the church, we find famous Cretan painters as Michele Damaschino and Emanuele Zane, but also a Cypriot painter was associated with them, Ioannis o Kyprios, also called Giovanni Ciprioto, who made the frescoes inside the dome (1589-1590) and later the Ascension in the bema (1593).

Giovanni Ciprioto and Thomas Flanghini are not the only Cypriots connected to the Greek Confraternity as a number of merchants and immigrants settled in Venice. The archives of the Hellenic Institute hold rich collections of manuscripts, documents and icons that prove the major input made by the Cypriots to the Confraternity. Some died there and asked to be buried in the cemetery behind the church of St. George. For them, as for many Greeks, Venice was a second homeland where one could study the Greek classical heritage and, more generally, humanities. For this reason, Venice became the centre of the Greek learning during the Ottoman rule until the end of the 18th century. Most of the books printed in Greek were edited in Venice and then sent to the entire Greek world, including Cyprus. It is no wonder that the Abbot Ephraim came to Venice in order to print his Description of the Kykkos Monastery in 1751. A few years later, the Archimandrite Kyprianos followed the same path when he published his Chronological History of Cyprus, in 1777.

The last person demonstrating the close ties between Cyprus and Venice is MARC ANTONIO BRAGADINO, the officer who led the Venetian defence of Famagusta in 1570-1571 and became the symbol of the sacrifice of the Republic of Venice to save the Christian world from the Ottoman threat. After the surrender of the city, on the 1st of August 1571, Bragadino was executed by flaying and his skin was shipped as a trophy to Istanbul where it was kept in the arsenal. According to tradition, the skin was stolen and brought to Venice so that the hero of Famagusta received a proper burial. First stored in the church of San Gregorio, the urn was finally displayed on the 18th of May, 1596, in the church of SAINTS JOHN AND PAUL (first altar in the right aisle). We note, over the urn, Bragadino's sculpted bust and a monochrome fresco depicting his martyrdom.

The long history of Veneto-Cypriot relationships from the Middle Ages until our days contains also romantic and beautiful imagined memories. One of them, the REGATA STORICA, connects a major Venetian feast with the arrival of Caterina Cornaro in Venice in 1489, even if the origins of the naval feasts go further back to the thirteenth century. Every year, during the first Sunday of September, the most famous race takes place where the best rowers of the city compete on their boats decorated according to old traditions. This very popular event linked to the maritime history of Venice is also an occasion to organise a spectacular maritime procession recalling the former power of the Venetian fleet. On that special day, one can admire a reconstructed Bucintore and the ducal gondola with sailors and officials dressed in traditional costumes.

An ongoing relationship

Municipalities, Cultural foundations as well as the Embassy of Italy in Cyprus organise events perpetuating the strong bonds between Cyprus and Venice. Scientists from Cyprus, especially architects and artists study in universities in Venice. Cyprus participates in the Art Biennale and Architecture Biennale in Venice as well as in other events of international reputation taking place in Venice. Influences of Venetian rule may be detected in the local dialect, design and gastronomy. The twinning of the city of Larnaka with Venice accentuates the will to continue the relationship between the two regions.

VENETIAN MONUMENTS IN OCCUPIED AREAS AND PROTECTION OF CULTURAL HERITAGE

As a result of the military invasion by Turkey in 1974 and the subsequent occupation of the northern part of the island, 36.2% of its territory, Cyprus' cultural heritage has been severely affected despite existing internationally binding treaties regarding the protection of cultural heritage. The damage is grave and in many cases, irreversible. There are notable Venetian monuments in the area under occupation. The Republic of Cyprus is continuously striving for the protection of these monuments which are a valuable part of Cyprus' and the world's cultural heritage.

The occupied part of Lefkosia also retains vestiges reminiscent of the Venetian presence on the island. Besides the walls of Savorgnano and the Kyrenia Gate already mentioned, in Atatürk square there is the column that symbolised the power of Venice as can be found in the main square of every town located in the territories that were controlled by Venice. In Lefkosia it is a re-used 6 meters tall Roman column in grey granite. It is set on a hexagonal base on which are engraved six coats-of-arms of major Venetian families whose members occupied official positions in the colonial government (Dona, Contarini, Pesaro and Michiel are discernible). In September 1570 after the Fall of Nicosia, the column lost the statue of the lion of St. Mark which crowned it because it expressed the power and the protection of Venice. The monuments of the sixteenth century can be completed by the Bedestan which was the Greek cathedral in the sixteenth century and which adjoins St. Sophia church, now Selimiye mosque. The building has undergone several changes and the great west door and several decorative elements of its portals, may be attributed to the Venetian period. Several coats-of-arms nevertheless bear the mark of their time since they belong to the type of winding armories, typical heraldic language of the Renaissance.

Like Lefkosia, AMMOCHOSTOS, which is occupied by Turkey since 1974, has retained its walls from the Venetian period, but these have not been entirely rebuilt. The Venetians had reinforced some parts of the walls and their intervention is evident at several places. Three points show the direct impact of Venice:

The Sea Gate, open on the port, totally rebuilt by the Venetians before the end of the fifteenth century, has kept its bow and marble pilasters decorated according to the criteria of the civil Renaissance architecture. The door has at its top the bas-relief of the lion of St. Mark and, below it, the inscription recording the restoration of the tower by the proveditore Nicolò Priuli in 1496.

The old Lusignan citadel was reinforced. New round towers were built over the former ones. The so-called "Tower of Othello" defends the main gate of the citadel which has above the entrance a huge marble relief of the lion of St. Mark, symbol of the strength of Venice on land and sea. Another important defensive work realised by the Venetians is the famous Martinengo bastion, at the northwest corner of the city walls, considered as one of the most perfect military masterpieces of the Renaissance. It bears the name of the count Hercole Martinengo, who initiated the works in 1559 and died there two years later. Some major Italian architects, as Gian Girolamo San Micheli, collaborated on this work. The bastion is celebrated for the ability of the Venetian military engineers to adapt theoretical concepts with the reality on the ground.

Most of the main architectural evidence of the Venetian official presence is concentrated around the central square of the city. Opposite the Gothic cathedral of St. Nicholas (converted into a mosque during the Ottoman period), the former royal Lusignan palace was renovated and changed into the Palazzo del Proveditore. Of the monument only the triple arched gate remains which formed the public façade of the palace, on which the arms of Giovanni Renier are carved, Captain of Famagusta in 1552. The decoration shows the direct influence of Renaissance style with the use of very large stone blocks derived from military architecture but decorated with triglyphs and guttae borrowed from ancient Greek classical design, and combined with the use of four granite columns taken from the Roman ruins of Salamis. The gateway was used as an official loggia for public audiences and was a major point for meetings and ceremonies in everyday life. From this loggia, the Ottoman chief commander, Lala Mustafa

Pasha, witnessed the martyrdom of the last Venetian Captain of Famagusta, Marc Antonio Bragadino, on the 15th of August 1571. In front of the Palazzo del Proveditore, and at a central place in the main square of the city, two columns were erected by the Venetian officers, as in most cities under Venetian domination, reproducing the model of the twin columns at the waterfront of Venice, which held aloft the statues of St. Theodore and the lion of St. Mark. In Ammochostos, as in Venice and elsewhere, those two columns had a ceremonial function for processions and punishment. At some time, the famous Sarcophagus of Venus, was displayed between the two columns which symbolised the close association of ancient myth with Venetian strength. The sarcophagus is located behind the gateway of the Palazzo del Proveditore and the two columns in front of the building opposite, an Ottoman madrasa which incorporates part of the old bishop's palace complex. Outside the walls and the main square of the city, few remains of Venetian civil architecture can be found. The ruins of the two palaces worth noting: the first one, is called the "Bedestan Palace" or the "Queen's Palace" and underwent many restorations; only the portal remains in its original form and preserves the stones worked "alla diamante". The second palace, called either "Bulwar's Arch" or "Biddulph's Gate", has few remains of the façade but those are the most interesting and ostentatious of the whole city. Its masonry is similar to the one of the gateway of the Palazzo del Proveditore with large blocks and rounded arches, but the entablature is rich in finely carved decoration with fine corbels, two of which with rampant lions holding up a shield with a cross.

Finally, it should be noted that the Church of Agios Mamas in occupied Morfou was an important place of worship from the Middle Ages to the eighteenth century. It was the subject of extensive restoration in the Venetian period according to the mixed criteria of the Franco- Byzantine style, especially recognisable in the motifs of the arch above the sarcophagus of the Saint. The iconostasis of the church is faithful to the mixture of styles that are typical of this period. We notice four slender columns with Gothic capitals and finely carved marble panels with Venetian coats-of-arms, executed with care and elegance which refers directly to models of the Italian Renaissance.

The Republic of Cyprus cannot guarantee the safety of visitors in the occupied areas. The Government of the Republic of Cyprus, since it is prevented by the Turkish military forces to exercise effective control over the occupied part of the island, will be unable to offer any help in case of accident, injury, theft, illness etc, and thus foreign nationals may find themselves in a difficult situation in case of need.
